

Devon Williamson

Research Assistant
Alternative Education Project

During the past five years, Devon has worked with community-based organizations, public schools, and city planners at the local, state, and national levels. Her interests include urban revitalization, youth development, and the impact of housing policy and land use on education reform. Williamson earned her bachelor's degree in architecture at Yale; her teaching credentials at San Francisco State University; and her master's degree in city planning at the University of California at Berkeley. In the fall of 2006, she entered Stanford University in pursuit of a doctoral degree in education administration and policy analysis, focusing on the relationship between cities and public schools.